

*Remarks for the Police Memorial Service
May 18, 2002*

Thank you. Commissioner Spell, Congressman Pickering, I'm glad to be here with you today. I appreciate this opportunity to say "thank you" to the law enforcement professionals who give, and have given, so much to our state.

This is something we should do more often, and it doesn't have to be in a setting like this. We should take every opportunity to express our appreciation.

I didn't know the officers we remember today. I wish I did. I know they were good and decent people who were just doing their job.

It doesn't matter if you're just walking down the street or getting a speeding ticket – just say “thanks for what you do.” At best, you'll make an officer's day; at worst, you won't get out of the ticket.

We're all familiar with that first impression of police officers. Our grade school teachers always taught us to find a policeman if we were in trouble, because they're our friends.

That same respect must be maintained today.

The men and women of law enforcement do so much that is taken for granted. Unfortunately, it is usually the tragedies that remind us of the risks that are taken every day, risks that you here in this room know all too well.

After the tragic attacks of September 11, our world changed and we were forced into a different frame of thinking. The issues we had always taken for granted, such as opening our mail or going to a large public event, were changed. We all wanted – and still want – to feel safe.

But in finding that safety we cannot forget the work that you do in leading us to it. We are not the ones on patrol. We are not the ones faced with life-or-death situations on a regular basis. We are not the ones who are first on the scene of a fatal accident or disturbing crime scene.

That's your job – and you do it well.

I believe all Americans have rethought the role of law enforcement officers in recent months. From the small towns of the Mississippi Delta to cities like New York, the average citizens are showing their appreciation for the work you do.

The numbers prove the results of your work. For the year 2000, according to the Bureau of Justice Statistics, serious violent crime levels declined; property crime rates declined; and arrests for drug violations are up.

Here in Mississippi, from the troopers of the Mississippi Highway Patrol to the officers of the smallest police department, you are making a difference in our communities, in our homes, and in our lives.

The work you do on a daily basis hasn't changed since the first law enforcement officers began walking a beat. The tools of the trade may be different, but the work's the same – it's the same in Mississippi as it around the nation and the world.

In particular, your commitment to our children is so special. Teaching them respect for our system of laws and people who work to enforce those laws is a building block for our society.

Working together, we can do so much more. It is important for communities and neighborhoods to become involved in public safety, to serve as unofficial back-up to your work.

We can show our appreciation for the work you do by our own efforts in helping out.

We can take back the neighborhoods that are on the brink. We can start neighborhood watches and community policing. We can do the things that help make your job just a little bit easier.

One interesting thing about your work – at the end of the day, there's no tangible product.

There's no way to measure what you've done in the day, other than to see kids playing outside; people wearing their seatbelts; families walking through their neighborhoods in the evening.

We don't see the dark streets you patrol at night. We don't know about the thoughts that run through your mind as you go into a dangerous situation with your gun drawn. We don't know the feelings in your heart at the end of a long and difficult shift.

We do know that every man and woman who wears a badge and takes an oath "to serve and protect" has qualities that help them rise above the rest.

We're here today to remember some very special officers who possessed those qualities. Deputy Glen Randall Chancellor, Sheriff Ernest Mullins, Sheriff Harold Ray Presley, Chief Deputy Willie Perry, and Patrolman Ronald Wayne Jones each made the ultimate sacrifice – and we are safer for it.

To their family members who are here today, you have our heartfelt thanks and appreciation for the sacrifices you have made as well.

And to all the officers here and across the state, let me simply say this: You are our heroes. You are people of honor – in your instinct and in your actions. You are the best in your world, and more than good enough for any other world.

You are the people who keep us safe – and we thank you for it. May God bless you and your families, our state and our nation.
